

Discrimination training is more important than ever, as organizations become increasingly aware of the damaging consequences of not having a strong anti-discrimination and harassment training program that reaches all employees, in all locations. Discrimination in the workplace can take many forms - all of which can be detrimental and, in many cases, illegal.

Whether intentional or not, discrimination comes with severe consequences. Making employment decisions, such as whether to hire, promote, or fire someone on the basis of their race, disability, sex, age and other categories, is prohibited under the laws enforced by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC). These laws also protect employees from retaliation, which remains the most frequent discrimination complaint filed with the EEOC.
