

Sexual harassment prevention training is required by many states and other governing entities. Countless companies across the US have instituted such training as part of their policy.

The EEOC, the federal agency that investigates claims related to discrimination and harassment has stated that it expects employers to train workers, and they will require evidence and documentation of this training if a complaint is filed with the agency.

According to EEOC guidelines, prevention is the best tool, combined with an effective complaint or grievance process. Employers can be held legally responsible for the actions of its employees.
